NINE LESSONS OF LIFE

A guide for parents

How to talk about difficult things without turning the conversation into an interrogation

Every child makes mistakes

A child may forget an agreement, come unprepared to a lesson, get a low grade, argue with a friend, make a hasty decision or struggle with a task.

In a situation like this, a parent usually wants to help the child understand what happened, acknowledge responsibility and avoid repeating the mistake. Yet the conversation often goes differently: the adult explains, the child defends themselves, the adult presses harder, and the child makes excuses, withdraws, blames others or says they do not care. A conversation about responsibility becomes an argument about who is right.

This guide offers another approach. It helps a parent create the conditions in which a child can calmly explore what happened, separate a result from a judgement about themselves, understand their feelings and reactions, see the boundaries of their responsibility, distinguish what was and was not within their control, learn from the experience and choose a manageable action.

> We cannot live a child's life for them. But we can help them learn from life itself.

1. About the family course

The first part of the course contains parent preparation and five family meetings. The first three introduce practical tools: A result does not define a person, Three sides of a situation and The experience map. In the fourth meeting, the family brings the tools together. The fifth applies the experience map to a good result.

The meetings use stories, questions and shared activities, with small practices to try between meetings. This guide helps the adult prepare for those conversations and can be read before starting the course.

2. Who this guide is for

The material is designed primarily for families with children aged 9 to 12. It may also be useful to other significant adults, guardians, family mentors, educators working with parents, and specialists in family and youth settings.

The course is not psychotherapy and does not replace help from a psychologist, doctor or another qualified professional.

3. What the course explores

The course helps adults and children practise a sequence for learning from experience:

> Event → observation → understanding → choice → action → result → reflection

The aim is not to turn every family situation into a lesson. It is to develop an ability to pause at a suitable moment and ask: What happened? What did I think and feel? What depended on me? What was outside my control? What can the result tell me? What action is available to me now?

This ability does not appear automatically. It can grow through calm conversations, examples and practical tools.

4. The parent's role

In the family course, the parent is not a judge, investigator or teacher of the “right” way to live. The aim is not to make a child admit guilt, prove the adult's superiority, demand a correct answer, deliver a long lecture, judge the child's character, analyse their personality, demand a promise never to make another mistake or use the course as punishment.

Your role is to help create a safe conversation: ask questions and listen; distinguish facts from judgements; acknowledge circumstances outside the child's control without removing their real responsibility; and help them find a small action they can take.

> The main result is not your child's agreement with you. It is the growing ability to reflect on their own experience and make decisions.

5. Seven principles for family conversation

5.1. A result does not define a person

An unsuccessful result tells us about a particular situation, not a person's worth. “You didn't complete your part of the work” describes an action. “You're irresponsible” judges the whole person. Such judgements can be especially painful while a child's sense of self is still developing.

Separating a person from a result does not excuse every action. You can honestly say, “You broke our agreement”, without adding, “You can never be relied on.” When children are less afraid that a mistake will destroy their dignity, it may be easier to acknowledge what happened and take responsibility.

5.2. Responsibility is different from self-blame

Responsibility helps someone see their role and choose an action. Self-blame turns the experience into a sweeping negative conclusion: “I ruined everything”, “There's something wrong with me”, “I'll never manage” or “I'm a bad person”.

Responsibility asks different questions: What depended on me? What could I have done differently? Can anything be put right? What will I try next time? Self-blame can lead to discouragement or to defensiveness and denial. Responsibility helps restore a person's ability to act.

5.3. Safety before analysis

Not every event should immediately become a learning exercise. If a child faces violence, bullying, a threat, a serious violation of boundaries, self-harm, dangerous behaviour or a marked deterioration in their condition, protection and help come first. “What did this teach you?” must not replace action by an adult.

A child is not responsible for every event. Sometimes the adult's responsibility is to protect the child, rather than ask them to work it out alone.

5.4. Sharing personal experience is voluntary

A child may choose not to discuss a personal event, work with a fictional situation, skip a question, keep their notes private or ask to stop. Respecting this choice does not mean dangerous behaviour must be ignored. The course must not be used to extract a confession or pry for information.

Respect for a child's boundaries can help make openness more likely over time.

5.5. A question should not conceal an accusation

A sentence may sound like a question while delivering a verdict. “What were you even thinking?” can be heard as “You did something stupid.” Try “How did you see the situation at the time?” or “What result were you expecting?”

A useful question does not force the child towards a prepared answer. It helps them see the situation more clearly.

5.6. Parents can make mistakes too

You do not have to appear flawless. You can acknowledge an error, change your mind, apologise, recognise a harsh tone, notice your part in a conflict or share a small experience of your own.

> “I started by blaming you, so you became defensive. I could have said it differently.”

Such an acknowledgement shows responsibility in practice. At the same time, do not burden your child with adult problems or make them responsible for your emotional state.

5.7. A next step matters more than a polished conclusion

“I understand everything” does not necessarily mean a child knows what to do. A useful conversation can end with a small, concrete action rather than a promise to become better.

Instead of “I'll never put things off again”, try “Today I'll set a reminder and start the first part of the task.” Instead of “I'll communicate better”, try “I'll wait until I'm calmer and message my friend without insults.”

A next step should be specific, small, manageable, clear and within the child's influence.

6. When to postpone a conversation

Consider waiting if either of you is very angry; your child has just experienced humiliation or a conflict; you want mainly to prove you are right; there is not enough time or privacy; your child is exhausted, hungry or unwell; you intend to use the course as punishment; or you have already decided what conclusion they must reach.

If a situation requires urgent intervention or protection, address safety first.

> “We're both too tense to talk about this now. Let's come back to it later.”

Do not use a pause to avoid the subject indefinitely.

7. Choosing a good time

Choose a calm, private setting, without rushing or starting immediately after a conflict or late at night. Make sure you are ready to listen and your child knows roughly how long the conversation will take.

It can be easier to talk while walking, travelling or doing something together, rather than face to face. Your child may feel less pressure.

8. Inviting your child

Avoid “I found a course that will fix the way you deal with mistakes.” It tells the child in advance that they are the problem.

Instead, you might say: “I found an interesting way to explore situations when something hasn't worked out. I'm curious about it too. Shall we try one conversation and then decide whether to continue?”

Or: “This isn't a test or a lecture. We can start with a fictional story and see whether it is useful.”

Explain in advance roughly how long it will take, that there is no need to guess the adult's preferred answer, that you can use a neutral example, that your child does not have to discuss something personal and that they can choose not to continue after trying it. Where a story asks for a precise fact, check it together against the story.

9. Preparing yourself

Before a conversation, ask yourself:

1. Do I want to help my child think or prove I was right?
2. Am I ready to hear a different view?
3. Can I listen without interrupting?
4. Am I ready to acknowledge circumstances outside my child's control?
5. Am I ready to notice my own part?
6. Can I avoid turning this into a lecture?
7. Can I stop if my child feels pressured?

If you mainly want to release your irritation, postpone the conversation. Familiarise yourself with the course format, choose a neutral example, remove distractions, allow enough time and come ready for dialogue rather than to fix your child. The course itself guides you through the stories and activities.

10. A conversation structure

1. Explain the format

Say that this is not a test, an interrogation or a search for someone to blame. For example: “Let's simply explore a situation together. It doesn't have to be about our lives.”

2. Start with a neutral story

Use a fictional situation, a film or book, an invented character or a small example from your own life. This can reduce defensiveness.

3. Listen to your child

Do not rush to correct an answer. Ask: “What makes you think that?”, “What matters most to you here?”, “How might the character have felt?” or “What other possibilities are there?”

4. Explore the tool

Understand and try one idea at a time rather than presenting several frameworks at once. The course explains each tool as you reach it.

5. Offer an opportunity to try it

Ask, “Would you like to try this with a situation from your life?” If your child declines, do not insist. You can stay with a fictional example.

6. Identify a next step

Do not choose the action for your child. Help make their idea more concrete: “When could you do that?”, “Would you like help?” or “What's one small action you could take?”

7. Invite feedback

Ask what was useful or unclear, whether anything felt pressuring and whether your child would want to use the tool again. Do not argue with their answers.

11. Helpful phrases

These phrases can help keep a conversation open:

- “I'm not going to tell you off right now.”
- “I want to understand how you saw the situation.”
- “How do you see it?”
- “What do we know for certain?”
- “What were you thinking at the time?”
- “What did you feel?”

- “What depended on you? What did not?”
- “What other explanations might there be?”
- “Would you like me to listen, help you think, or offer advice?”
- “What can be done now? What's one small action you could take?”
- “Would you like my help?”
- “Thank you for telling me.”
- “A mistake doesn't make you a bad person.”
- “You're responsible for this part, but not for everything that happened.”
- “We can come back to this later.”
- “I could have acted differently too.”
- “I'm sorry I started by blaming you.”

12. Phrases to avoid

These statements often make a child more defensive:

- “I told you so.”
- “You always ruin everything.”
- “You never listen to me.”
- “Other children don't behave like that.”
- “What were you even thinking?”
- “It's your own fault.”
- “You should be ashamed.”
- “You're making it up.”
- “This is all because you're lazy.”
- “Just admit that I'm right.”
- “After everything we've done for you.”
- “Let this be a lesson to you.”
- “You should be grateful for this experience.”
- “I know better than you how you feel.”
- “This conversation isn't over until you admit you were wrong.”

If you have already said something like this, you can repair the conversation: “I started judging you instead of talking about the situation. Let me try saying that differently.”

13. Common mistakes

13.1. Starting with the most painful situation

Practise with a neutral example first.

13.2. Turning dialogue into a lecture

If the parent does most of the talking, the child has less room to think aloud.

13.3. Asking questions to draw out a predetermined answer

A child can quickly sense that the adult wants agreement rather than their own view.

13.4. Correcting every word

You do not have to challenge every imprecise phrase. First try to understand the overall meaning.

13.5. Demanding an immediate conclusion

Some children need time to think about a conversation.

13.6. Confusing responsibility with obedience

A child can make a responsible decision that does not completely match what the parent wants.

13.7. Using tools during an argument

“Quickly tell me what depended on you!” turns a tool into a way to apply pressure.

13.8. Demanding to see personal notes

A child's written reflections can remain private.

13.9. Discussing your child in front of others

Do not hold the conversation in front of relatives, friends or other children without your child's agreement.

13.10. Searching for a lesson instead of helping

Sometimes a child needs protection and support before any discussion.

14. If your child declines

A refusal is not a failure. You can say: “All right. I won't make you. We can come back to this later.”

Instead of applying pressure, you could try the exercise yourself, share a small mistake of your own, use a film story, leave the child a card, offer a written response or shorten the conversation to one question.

Do not punish a refusal, accuse your child of being closed off, demand an explanation, bring in other adults to apply pressure or unexpectedly start a conversation without warning.

15. If a conflict begins

If the conversation becomes an argument, stop. You might say: “We've stopped exploring what happened and started trying to prove each other wrong. Let's take a break.”

Afterwards, ask yourself: Was I listening or arguing? Was I talking about an action or judging the person? Did I acknowledge my part? Was I demanding the right answer? Was my child ready to talk? Did I start too soon?

If needed, apologise: “I started this conversation as though I'd already made up my mind. That was unfair.”

16. Privacy and its limits

Respect your child's personal space. Do not promise absolute secrecy when safety is at risk. You might say:

> “I'll try to respect what you share with me. But if I learn that you or someone else is in serious danger, I'll need to involve people who can help.”

Do not read personal notes without permission, discuss them with relatives, use them in later conflicts, publish them or pass them to others without a need to do so.

17. When professional help is needed

The course is not designed to resolve situations involving threats to life or health, violence, bullying, self-harm, threats to harm oneself or others, dangerous substance use, marked deterioration in mental or physical health, dangerous behaviour, a possible crime or a situation beyond a parent's competence.

Seek qualified help and act according to the circumstances. If there is immediate danger, act without delay.

18. Recognising whether the course helped

Do not expect that after a few conversations your child will stop making mistakes or always accept responsibility calmly. Benefits may appear gradually.

You may notice that your child is less likely to judge their whole self by one result, can describe what happened without insulting themselves, distinguishes facts from assumptions, sees what was within their influence, does not take responsibility for everything, suggests a more specific action, asks for help more often or feels less afraid to talk about mistakes. You may also find yourself beginning fewer conversations with blame and developing a shared language for exploring situations.

> The measure is not whether you remember the tools' names, but whether their way of thinking gradually becomes useful in real life.

19. A short checklist for parents

Before the conversation

- Calm yourself and choose a suitable time.
- Let your child know in advance.
- Start with a neutral situation.
- Do not prepare the “right” answer in advance.
- Familiarise yourself with the activity and allow enough time.

During the conversation

- Listen without interrupting.
- Discuss actions, not a person's worth.

- Distinguish responsibility from self-blame.
- Acknowledge outside circumstances.
- Do not demand confessions.
- Respect the right not to answer.
- Avoid lecturing and help identify a small action.

After the conversation

- Do not demand promises or judge your child.
- Ask whether help is needed and what was useful.
- Accept criticism of the format.
- Do not use what was shared against your child.
- Allow time to use the tool in real life.

20. The parent's reflection

After a conversation, ask yourself:

1. Was the time suitable?
2. Was my child ready to take part?
3. Did I listen more than I spoke?
4. Did I discuss an action or judge the person?
5. Did I acknowledge circumstances outside my child's control?
6. Could my child choose not to answer?
7. Did I try to steer them towards a conclusion I had prepared?
8. Did I keep a respectful tone?
9. Was a small next action identified?
10. What could I change in the next conversation?

These questions are for reflecting on the conversation, not evaluating your child's personality.

21. Your child's feedback

You can offer your child a short anonymous questionnaire after a conversation:

1. Was the conversation clear?
2. Did you feel pressured?
3. Could you choose not to answer?
4. Was anything useful?
5. What would you remove?
6. Would you want to use this tool again?

Do not dispute the answers. If your child says they felt pressure, the task is to understand which words or actions may have contributed to that feeling, rather than prove otherwise.

Learning together

It is hard for a child to learn from experience if every mistake threatens their dignity and their relationship with a parent. A safe conversation does not remove responsibility, rules or consequences. It creates conditions in which a child can more easily see what happened honestly, acknowledge their part, avoid destroying themselves with blame, ask for help, put right what is possible and choose an action.

A parent does not need to conduct the conversation perfectly. Sometimes it is enough to pause, let go of an accusation and ask one honest question.

> “Even when I make a mistake, we can talk about it. I won't be humiliated, and I won't be helped to hide from responsibility either.”

In such an atmosphere, the ability to learn from one's own life can gradually grow.
